

In this book the author avoids technical detail, there's plenty of that elsewhere, and examines the personalities involved in the creation of the engine that powered the world. He studies the contribution each inventor made, their nature, what drove them on, their family lives and how they reacted to each other.

This is a human story, one of blind faith, deception and intrigue. It explains much of the perceived wisdom that surrounded the early grapple for power and fortune. It exposes how our belief is derived from romantic myth, smear and conjecture.

Based on less than fifty years of engineering turmoil when one engine powered most of the Industrial and all the Transport Revolutions, this story exposes the distortion that has clouded the achievements of one brilliant Cornishman. It absolves those we have blamed and explains how Statesmen and the highest in the land conspired to denigrate the lifetime's work of a genius.

This is the story of Richard Trevithick, engineer, inventor and adventurer as he emerges from long years of obscurity. There is nothing as powerful as the truth.
